Summer Edition of NetworkNews Has a New Look

Friday, July 5, 2002 – The latest edition of NetworkNews sports CPRN's new colours and our new logo – "Fresh Ideas for Canada's Future". We hope you like the new look.

And there's plenty for our readers, too.

You'll find a story about the first in the Family Network's series of papers on Canada's major cities: Why Cities Matter, by Neil Bradford. The paper has received the endorsement of Winnipeg's mayor, Glen Murray, a leading spokesperson for the C-5, an organization of some of Canada's largest cities.

There's a story about a paper that's made a bit of a splash. It's Mapping the Links, by Susan Phillips with Michael Orsini, all about the challenge of involving citizens in making policy.

And there are stories about papers on the importance of informal learning to the Canadian economy, the relevance of a life course perspective to policies for an aging workforce, and some of Jane Jenson's latest thoughts about the links between globalization, social cohesion and citizenship.

There's news from CPRN's fundraising campaign and news of other comings and goings.

And, of course, there is Judith Maxwell's feature column, this time on her experience with citizens' dialogues on the future of health care on behalf of the Romanow Commission.
