Network News Summer Edition Now Available

September 14, 2001 – Here's a chance to get caught up on some of what CPRN and its associates have been up to – take a look at the Summer issue of Network News.

A recent background paper by Graham Lowe and Dianne Looker, examining what we know and don't know about post-secondary enrollment patterns, is the focus of our lead article. Lowe and Looker point to the research gaps to be filled if we are to act with assurance in this critical area of the "continual learning society".

From the Family Network, Jane Jenson and Martin Papillon map out the changing boundaries of citizenship. They explore four challenges to the current understanding of citizenship: diversity, location citizenship, social citizenship and participation. We look at some of their conclusions and suggestions for further research.

There's an interview with Grant Schellenberg, Senior Researcher for the Work Network, on the launch of the exciting new Web site, jobquality.ca, which presents the latest data on the quality of employment in Canada.

There's also an article on Sholom Glouberman's final report of a three-year research project of the Health Network, "Towards a New Perspective on Health Policy", and a piece on Rianne Mahon's views on the importance of child policy research. And we've got the story of how the Quality of Life Indicators Project got its "prototype" set of indicators.

Finally, of course, there's Judith Maxwell's Commentary (on the urban "social commons").
